

COPYRIGHT NOTICE FOR STUDENT HANDBOOKS

When someone creates a piece of writing, a picture, a song, or anything else, they own that creation. The creator owns the right to decide how the creation gets used. That's called "copyright". . . the creator owns the copyright for his/her own creations. Copyright covers all writing, music, art, photographs, video, computer creations, etc.

Copyright means that you can't make a copy of that material or pretend that it's your own. If you use a little bit of it (for example, if you quote a sentence from someone's writing, or use their song in a video you make), you must tell who actually created it (usually in a footnote).

If Ben made a free copy of Mrs. Smith's story without Mrs. Smith's permission or pretended that it was part of a story he wrote, Ben would be stealing that work and committing a crime--a violation of a federal law (Title 17, US Code). Ask your library media specialist or an Administrator if you have any questions.
